ISLAMABAD, Pakistan — A long-standing power struggle between the main insurgent factions of the Pakistani Taliban is causing growing tension in the country's tribal areas as the militants try to consolidate power there and threaten the security of Pakistan, activists and analysts say. Pakistan's spy agency, Inter-Services Intelligence, or ISI, has been covertly supporting the Pakistani Taliban from its network of secret bases in Waziristan, Pakistan's remote tribal regions along the Afghan border, some of whose leaders are allies of Osama bin Laden. But the Pakistani Taliban's power struggle with an Islamist political party that has close ties to Waziristan's native Pashtun tribes, as well as with a rival faction led by Hakimullah Mehsud, has created a dangerous tinderbox for Pakistan's security forces. The Pakistani Taliban, like its Afghan counterpart, the Taliban, has been suffering from internal upheaval as leaders squabble over political power, said Haris Bari, the author of "Tribes: The Fabric of Pakistan." But the Pakistani Taliban, in addition to external pressure from the United States and the Pakistani government, has been hit hard by the arrest of key leaders, a shakeup of its military hierarchy and a recent Pakistani government military offensive against the Taliban. "We are seeing a major change in how the Taliban functions," Mr. Bari said. "But it's not clear yet who is controlling the situation or for whom." Thousands of suspected militants are under arrest. Militants loyal to Hakimullah Mehsud, the top leader of the Pakistani Taliban's North Waziristan faction, have targeted the Afghan Taliban's North Waziristan tribal leader, Mullah Mohammad Omar, in a brutal war of words that has spilled into open violence. The arrest of Shafi Alam, the chief of the Pakistani Taliban's
