Ask HN: I want to be an editor, but will I be any good? - euroclydon I was wondering, if I really want to become an editor one day, will I be any good? Does anyone have any tips/pointers on how to get started? I know I will have to work on my spelling, grammar, and proof reading, but I don't know how to get started on that. I've seen people say things like, "read everything a lot", but that seems awfully time consuming, especially if you are trying to break into the field. I've been picking up a lot of newspaper articles and reading them very closely, but that won't get me very far. Is there a particular website or something that people use to test themselves, and become an editor? ===== mattmaroon My first advice is learn how to construct a coherent essay (read "How to Write"); this is a skill every editor should have, more or less. Good writers will have their own pet phrases and idioms that they use all the time, and should be able to reel off an essay in 5 minutes that makes perfect sense. It takes a lot of work to learn how to do that, and very few people do so. Once you have that, then practice identifying the subject and verb, the three main parts of a sentence, the four main parts of a paragraph, the various types of sentences, the types of clauses, and how to identify each clause/part by looking at the syntax of the sentence. Then you'll have an essential core of skills to fall back on and add on additional grammar as you go along. If you want to build up a resume, you can probably enter editing positions when you're just starting out, and
