Alginate is the most commonly used natural polymeric biomaterial for encapsulation of hepatocytes. However, the disadvantage of alginate is that the alginate gel easily dissolves and this causes a rapid release of the entrapped cells. This study investigated the alginate 3% system that can sustain the cell growth for up to 45 days in a medium containing 30% fetal bovine serum (FBS) and compared this system with the alginate 2% system. The cell viability of encapsulated HepG2 cells in alginate 3% matrix showed higher viability than that in alginate 2%. However, the cells in alginate 2% matrix showed longer viability than that in alginate 3%. The alginate 3% system showed higher albumin secretion than that of the alginate 2%. The alginate 3% system suggested a sustained release of the entrapped cell growth, which supported the cells for longer period than that of the 2% alginate system. These results suggest that alginate 3% is useful for the encapsulation of hepatocytes for long-term culture.Some potentially useful ways to improve your adult-learning approach Wow, what an interesting collection of great information! With the use of radioimmunoassay we studied the circulating serum erythropoietin (Ep) levels in patients with various alcoholic and nonalcoholic liver diseases and in controls with normal liver function. Samples were obtained from patients with cirrhosis (n = 30), alcoholic cirrhosis (n = 15), nonalcoholic cirrhosis (n = 15), and from patients with a history of active alcohol intake (n = 20) but who did not develop cirrhosis. The serum samples from patients were obtained after at least 3 months of abstinence from alcohol. In patients with cirrhosis of alcoholic or nonalcoholic etiology, significantly higher levels of Ep were found as compared with controls (621 +/- 137 (SEM), 393 +/- 86, and 156 +/- 37 mU/ml, respectively). In patients with active alcohol intake, the serum Ep level was 188 +/- 31 mU/ml. A positive correlation was found between serum Ep and the percentage of functional liver cells in liver biopsies (r = 0.46, P less than 0.005). Plasma hemoglobin levels in patients with cirrhosis were significantly higher than those in patients with alcoholic cirrhosis (14.6 +/- 0.7 vs 10.3 +/- 0.5 g/dl, respectively, P less than 0.01). We conclude that hyperproduction of erythropoietin may explain the higher levels of serum erythrocytes in patients with cirrhosis.SERVICES Parade allows you to build an amazing parade-style navigation or video advertising strip for your website that will bring in traffic in your niche!
