Prevalence of musculoskeletal pain (MSP) and its association with exposure to traumatic events in psychiatric nurses was investigated. The study employed a cross-sectional design and prospective longitudinal design. A total of 651 psychiatric nurses were recruited from two psychiatric hospitals in South Korea. Participants underwent questionnaires to determine traumatic events, experience of MSP, and its functional and psychological impact. Eighteen percent of participants (n=127) reported MSP in the past 12 months. Among all participants, 41.1% (n=183) exhibited pain during the past 12 months. Regression analysis showed the presence of a significant association between exposure to traumatic events and pain. The hierarchical ordered logistic regression revealed that exposure to traumatic events, including combat and physical assault, was significantly associated with MSP. Further studies are needed to explore the prevalence and association between exposure to traumatic events and MSP in nurses. To reduce MSP and its negative impacts, it is important for nurses to be given proper exposure to traumatic events and comprehensive pain management.1. Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to the field of portable storage/retrieval apparatuses and, more specifically, to a spindle drive assembly for releasably mounting and supporting a member in and from which it is susceptible of angular, axial and/or radial movement. 2. Prior Art Spiral reels are typically constructed to have a member
